

BE AWESOME

My son saw worsening results each semester as he struggled, unknowingly until last summer, with ADD. His confidence was shattered and his anxiety made things worse. He had to drop out of his 4-year school and go to community college where things were not much better until last fall when he started working weekly with Becky. Becky gave him the structure and acted as a sounding board to begin to make sound decisions again and help him to organize his academic and non-academic life. He feels accountable to the plans they put together. It is a professional relationship and so much healthier than if we as parents were involved. Because of Becky's work with our son, he had a successful fall semester, was able to get re-admitted into his four-year school, and earned a 3.17 in engineering this spring semester. This was the best semester GPA he has earned in college. Best of all, our capable son believes in himself again.
